InkPlus CISS Printer :

An InkPlus (CISS) Continuous Ink supply System, also known as a continuous flow system (CFS), is a method for delivering a large and practically unlimited volume of liquid ink to a comparatively small inkjet print-head.

Many business and professional grade printers incorporate a continuous flow system in their design to increase the speed and volume of printing capacity. Some aftermarket companies also build retrofit accessories to convert certain models of consumer-grade printers into continuous flow systems.

InkPlus CP - 1234

Comparison :

- Most low-cost consumer printers place small ink tanks directly on the carriage with the print heads. These tanks can have extremely small liquid volumes, as low as 10 ML, and consequently require frequent replacement. More expensive business-grade printers use progressively larger ink tanks on the print head, but as the platen width and speed of the printer increases it eventually becomes impractical to have the tanks integrated with the print-heads due to the high mass and inertia the liquid volume adds to the print-heads and the reduced accuracy of printing that occurs.

InkPlus CP - 1234

- Separating the ink storage from the print-head also allows the tank to be refilled or replaced while a print job is in progress. With ink tanks located on the print-head, replacement typically requires reprising and alignment checks that necessarily require aborting any current print job. Separated ink tanks can be refilled or reprised without disrupting a very large or expensive printing task.
